

Question:

A 17-year-old teenager is brought to the emergency department with severe bleeding from his right hand. He was involved in a gang fight about 30 minutes ago where he received a penetrating stab wound by a sharp knife in the region of the ‘anatomical snuffbox’. A vascular surgeon is called in for consultation. Damage to which artery is most likely responsible for his excessive bleeding?

Answer Choices:

- A. Radial artery
- B. Ulnar artery
- C. Princeps pollicis artery
- D. Brachial artery

Reasoning + Answer:

<think> Reasoning process here :

- Location of injury: The anatomical snuff box is an area located on the radial , dorsal aspect of the forearm , and is bordered by the tend ons of the extensor pollic is long us , ext ensor car pi radialis bre vis , and extensor pollic is bre vis muscles .
- Vascular structures in the region: Several arteries pass through this region . Most notably , the radial artery passes through the anatomical snuff box . However , it is technically incorrect to state that the radial artery runs directly through the snuff box , as it is actually close to it but does not pass through it . Instead , it's located posterior to the wrist and from lateral view , the radial artery is anterior . However , this is cut by the TFCC but more relevant to us would be the deep : the stated arteries via FP lock and distorted significant distances further forward as flex extends effectively against shoulder extension and pulls wound deeper distal from anatomy pinpoint linking TH structures provide anterior -most area respectively
- Complications from stab wounds: In penetrating trauma , the arteries ' proximity to the wound site increases the risk of injury .
- Extrinsic vascular relationships: We need to emphasize that the blood supply of the distal forearm is most effectively left upper through :
